We have been recently much interested by an inspection of some very beautiful monumental sculpture at the establishment of Mr. S. Hodgson. This is something altogether on a higher plane of art than the average stock of a stone-mason, and belongs rather to the department of the fine arts. Three of these specimens, representing child figures, are specially attractive, one a boy hanging a wreath on a monumental cross-the finest of all; another represents a boy with an inverted torch, the classic symbol of as follows: death, and a third, a beautiful draped figure of a little girl sitting sorrowfully over the grave of a lost friend or relative. Mr. Hodgson has also in stock some very beautiful specimens of marbles from the Italy, and some very fine granites
